'Schools don't need pens and paper any more: Students should only use tablets and laptops.'

Today technology is used everywhere. Statistics show that almost 85 % of workers in the US use a laptop or PC at work. But in most schools students still learn with books and write on paper. So, should schools still use pens and paper today?

Firstly, if students use computers from a very young age, their IT skills will develop more quickly. For example, Mark Zuckerberg learned programming early and developed his social media site while he was still at college. In addition, using computers could make life easier for students who find writing difficult. They could type their answers without worrying about their handwriting.

But there are negative effects of using too much technology too. Science has shown that when you write something down by hand, you can remember it better. Also, when students use their hands, it helps them with other skills, like drawing.

In conclusion, I think that schools should use technology because students should learn skills which they will later need in a job. But it would be a bad idea to not use pens or paper at all because young children also need to develop other skills for daily life.
